THE WESTUN MURDER

Mystery Surrounding the Killing of Massachusetts Woman.

THE MOTIVE NOT DISCOVERED

Two Theories of the Crime Advanced by the Police - Robbery Not Attempted-Slayer May Have Been a

Weston, Mass., April 4.-State and local detectives working to find a clew to the murderer of Miss Mabel Page find themselves in the dark. They have questioned every man, woman interviewed in regard to this matter, said: and child in the village who in their opinion might be in position to throw a ray of light on the mystery, with blank results. None has seen friend or stranger enter or leave the handsome home of Edward Page, the victim's father, in the part of the fatal day in which the crime must have been committed. None can suggest any one as a possible enemy of the murdered weman or any member of her family.

The only person even mentioned to connection with the murder, therefore, is an Italian, with whom, Mr. Page says, his danguter had a quarrel a year ago. The man, who was employed in a place not far from the Page bame, was impudent to Miss Page, the father relates, and she ordered him off the grounds. As he slouched through the gate the Italian, Mr. Page asserts, threatened to return and kill the wo-to revenge or insanity, The theory the nurder is a venge ance, though, is held by most of those who have followed the police inquiry from the beginning. On that basis the suggestion is advanced that a woman might have been the murderer, and several arguments at least superficially plausible are advanced in support thereof. It is pointed out that Miss Page plainly had been killed immetoflet for the street, and that precluded the possibility that the bearer of the false information that her brother had been injured was a man. Had the vislitar been a man, it was remarked, Miss Page unquestionably would have had him wait for her in the reception room while she changed her bouse gown for a walking costume. As she was alone in the house, probably she would have locked the door of her room while changing from one frock to the other. That would have made the question, because if the man had attacked her in the reception room

A woman, on the other hand, would have communical Miss Pane's entire confidence. She might have left such a visitor downstales, but it mostly was possible she would become impatient for details of the supposal revision to her brother and would call the viscou to her room to question her while dressing. That would give the manner er, if a woman, ample opportunity to stab Miss Page, it is said, because she could move to any part of the bestroom without exciting suspicion, and it would be simple for her to approach Miss Page closely enough to pivoce the blade into her victim's back. The cuts on the dead woman's right wrist are so deep as to indicate the murderer was not strong enough to overpower Miss Page even after the first stab which sprgeons said was sufficient to cause death. Had a man been the assassin there would have been fewer unnecessary wounds. A woman street
